

Dear ASIRT Friends,

For many children around the world, just trying to cross the street to reach school safely presents great challenges. Unfortunately, far too many children do not succeed and are injured or killed annually en route. As one of our colleagues observes, "The painful reality is that young people in many countries are dying to get an education."

Often the concerted efforts of dedicated stakeholders make the difference. Kenya is an outstanding example of such a successful coordinated approach. The combined initiatives of the partners of the Bloomberg Philanthropies Global Road Safety Program have resulted in measurable improvements which are currently saving precious young lives.

Our joint endeavors have led to a reduction of speed around pilot schools, the establishment of school crossing zones and the introduction of a "Slow Down Speed Kills" campaign, urging motorists to heed laws as police target violators with new speed cameras.

We are all responsible. We can take action to improve road safety by supporting programs and organizations, reducing speed, avoiding distractive behaviors, wearing reflective gear or encouraging friends to do the same. We are ultimately all partners in the campaign to protect and preserve life on the worlds' roads.

For a long time, many road safety-based organizations in Kenya and beyond have been wondering why they don't seem to 'strike it with the mainstream media.' After the day 1 of the ASIRT Media Advocacy Workshop for NGOs, it all makes sense now.
